How to Bring Healthy Food to Underserved Neighborhoods

In December 2009, the NYC City Council passed the Food Retail Expansion to Support Health (FRESH) program to provide incentives for grocery stores to locate in underserved neighborhoods and Governor Patterson announced the administrators of his Food Market Revolving Loan Fund. While government efforts expand, urban farmers continue to work on the ground, and more recently on top of buildings, to bring produce into the city. Given the overlap in health issues and poor access to fresh produce, these efforts target quality of life and health care concerns for low-income neighborhoods. Using multifamily housing as the prism, we will compare and contrast the recently unveiled incentive programs, the business of grocery stores as tenants and urban farming's latest successes.

In addition to the panel discussion, a wide range of innovative leaders in the healthy food movement will participate in an "ideas fair" during the refreshments hour.
